University (Shreemati Nathibai Damodar Thackersey Women's University - SNDT) in 1916. Parsis in Bombay took active interest in women's education. In 1913 out of ten high schools for girls in Bombay, eight were run by Parsis. Later the All India Women's Conference (1926) resolved to start a college to be entirely staffed and managed by women. This college is Lady Irwin College, Delhi.

The missionary education started in Tamil Nadu with German Lutheran missionary Bartholomaus Ziegenbalg and his elder colleague Henri Plustscham who arrived in India on 9 July 1706. Though the purpose was to serve the cause of Protestant religion, they established schools in the Danish settlement of Tharangambadi (Tranquebar). This was a pioneering effort which was followed by the missionaries of the later period. Ziegenbalg learnt Tamil and translated the Bible into Tamil. He imported a printing press from Germany and arranged for the publication of Christian literature.

In the presidency of Madras, a survey made in 1822 showed the existence of 12,498 institutions of all kinds with 1, 84, 110 students on roll. Sir Thomas Munro, Governor of Madras, 1820-1827, claimed that the state of education, though low compared to England, was higher than in most of European countries.

In Madras two Scottish chaplains Rev. Lawrie and Rev. Bowie started a school in the vicinity of St. Andrew's Church, Egmore, in 1835. This school was later shifted to Black Town (George Town from 1911) in 1837. There were 59 students studying in that school. Rev. William Miller upgraded the school into a college in 1862. This is the Madras Christian College, Tambaram. Realising the importance of English education the elite of the Madras city presented a petition in 1839 to provide facilities for Western education. In response a High School was established at Egmore in 1840 which was upgraded to the status of a college in 1857. This is Madras Presidency College.

In Tiruchirappalli in 1838 Holy Cross Sisters founded the St. Joseph's Anglo Indian School. The Jesuits established St. Joseph's College in 1844. In Tirunelveli the Christian Mission Society started a school in 1844 which was upgraded to the status of a college (then C.M.S. College, now St. John's College) in 1876.

Progress in Higher Education under Crown

After the British Parliament transferred the government and territories of the East India Company to the Crown, in educational affairs the policy of the Company continued to be the policy of the Crown. The success of university education and the growing demand for educated Indian in administration, in law courts provided stimulus for the establishment of more number of colleges and universities. At the same time the substitution of English in courts and offices deprived Muslims of their employment when Persian was court and administrative
